Investing During an Election Year

Investing during an election year can cause one a great deal of uncertainty. From market volatility to policy uncertainty, investors often wonder how to position themselves. While elections introduce uncertainty, they also present opportunities. Let's explore some historical returns and strategies that you should consider when you are looking at your portfolio.

Market Returns During Election Years

Although you may face some uncertainty during an election year, history shows that neither the occurrence of an election nor the party elected significantly impacts market returns. According to an article from Investopedia titled Investors' Election Year Worries Could Be Overblown, from the end of 2023:

- From 1928 to 2020, the market has been favorable 20 out of 24 election years, which amounts to 83.3% of the time.
- The average return during these years has been approximately 11.58%.

Investment Strategies for Election Years

While the market may be more volatile than normal during an election year, it is important for you to stick to your plan and focus on variables that truly influence markets. Consider the following strategies when you're going through an election year:

DIVERSIFICATION

Rather than chasing short term trends, it is important to maintain a diversified portfolio. Spread your funds across different asset classes. Having a diversified portfolio can help manage volatility, especially when it comes to political risk.

LONG-TERM PERSPECTIVE

Remember that elections are just short milestones along your investment journey. They may create short-term volatility, but by keeping a long-term perspective, investors can avoid making emotional reactions that can be detrimental.

REBALANCING

During times of market volatility, it is important to periodically rebalance your portfolio. This ensures that your asset allocation is aligned with your risk tolerance and investment goals. When the market fluctuates, some assets become over or underweighted.

By understanding historical patterns and keeping your investment plan intact, you can navigate these times of volatility with confidence.

Investing involves risk including the potential loss of principal. Past performance is not a guarantee of future results. No investment strategy, including diversification, asset allocation and rebalancing, can guarantee a profit or protect against loss. There is no guarantee that a diversified portfolio will outperform a non-diversified portfolio; it is a method used to help manage portfolio volatility.

Bonds are subject to market and interest rate risk if sold prior to maturity. Bond values will decline as interest rates rise and bonds are subject to availability and change in price.

Investments in real estate may be subject to a higher degree of market risk because of concentration in a specific industry, sector or geographical sector. Other risks can include, but are not limited to, declines in the value of real estate, potential illiquidity, risks related to general and economic conditions, stage of development, and defaults by borrower.

The fast price swings in commodities will result in significant volatility in an investor's holdings. Commodities include increased risks, such as political, economic, and currency instability, and may not be suitable for all investors.

The Sandwich Generation PART I

Protecting Your Parents' Financial Future

By John Bailey, CFP®, Executive Vice President & Chief Revenue Officer

The Pew Research Center states that roughly a quarter of all adults in America are in the “sandwich generation” – with a parent 65 years or older and either raising one child younger than 18 or providing financial support to an adult child. Many adults in their 40s and 50s are facing the pressures of not only providing for retirement for themselves, but also attempting to help with their older parents and their young adult children.

financial life. Is it another child? A friend? A stranger? Try to be as comprehensive as possible – look at not just investments but the parents’ spending, saving, and giving habits. Try to emphasize that this is not a matter of “taking over” their finances, but rather as part of a total attitude of caring for them and doing what’s best for them. Often, a certified financial planner (CFP) or neutral attorney to “sandwichers” can help move the conversation in a positive direction.

PLAN Review the current plan for the older adult (or if there isn’t one, create it!) and make sure it is consistently reviewed to ensure it continues to work for the parent.

Many experts agree that it is important to create a balance in a plan between making positive changes where needed in investing and spending, while at the same time avoiding too much change, which can create confusion and concern with the older adult. Also, it is imperative to have plans in place for crisis situations – especially with serious, sudden events like heart attacks or strokes that render the adult unable to act at all, or the death of the parent.

REVIEW As much as possible, “sandwichers” need to find ways to review financial records for older adults to ensure they are not falling prey to potential fraud.

This will require a large amount of trust – and often, that trust can only develop over time. Although it may make it more time-consuming for “sandwichers,” keeping the older adult involved and part of the review process can help build that trust and provide more confidence that it is working for the good of the parent. Account monitoring services, automatic bill payments and shredding financial documents can also be key ingredients in the review process and make it work more efficiently.

Next time, we’ll discuss how “sandwichers” can help the “other side” of the sandwich for the younger generation in need of financial planning and advice. Always feel free to consult with your financial planning professionals at Central Trust Company for help in this difficult but vital part of caring for your older loved ones and their financial futures. ■d

In this two-part series, we will outline helpful strategies “sandwichers” can utilize when providing assistance and guidance to those they care about, while also balancing their financial nest eggs.

First, we look at the challenges of providing financial help to older adults. Sadly, with the social and technological changes of today, financial fraud and the effects of cognitive decline create unique challenges for older adults trying to protect their retirement savings from avoidable loss. Often, “sandwichers” are either called upon to help their parents, or worse yet, hear nothing from them... until it’s too late. The closeness of older parents and children can sometimes help the planning process needed to factor in safeguards against undesired events. But other times, that very closeness makes it hard for both sides to agree on what those safeguards should be. Most experts agree that there are three fundamental parts of any plan to help protect the finances of older adults who may become vulnerable to fraud and loss – talk, plan, and review.

TALK “Sandwichers” need to find ways to start a conversation with their parents about their finances.

Usually, sooner is better than later. Ensure that you know who the “gatekeepers” are for the various parts of the parent’s
